

How is following a religious vocation a courageous and radical action?

Devoting yourself completely to God is both courageous and radical. To give up everything for God, and step out of the path that most adults choose requires great strength and faith. Some people might judge you, but you have to trust in God and answer his calling.

Having a religious life is very much like the life of Jesus and the apostles. They use their time to pray and preach the life of Jesus. People who choose religious vocations are much more focused on God than most average Catholics are. They take the time to practice their faith and inspire others to live good Catholic lives.

Giving up everything may be hard, but these people are willing to do it. They take vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. This means that they must give up material possessions, marriage, and having children. They promise to be obedient to God and do whatever he asks of them. This is very radical and courageous because they have to sacrifice many things for God. Choosing this life is a bold choice. Although difficult, it is special and has countless rewards.
